Federico Castillo presented his talk, Sheep Shearing in the Southwest and its Numismatic Connection.

Federico discovered sheep shearing tokens when looking for interesting token denominations. Most tokens were made for travelling shearing companies working along the Mexican border areas of New Mexico and Texas, although they are found in other states as well. Shearing crews, often family-based, moved from ranch to ranch performing the shearing tasks and providing routine veterinary care for ranchers.

A team captain would inspect the fleece and then give the workman a token. At the end of the day, you would turn in your tokens for your pay. When electric shears became commonplace, the pay scale change and so did the denomination on the tokens. Good for one sheep usually indicates an early token, while a token good for 100 or more sheep is undoubtedly modern.

While sheep tokens vary in quality and number, there are a few general traits. Texas tokens are generally issued with information about the shearing companies owned by Latinos. New Mexican tokens are generally pictorial and issued by Basque or Catalan-owned businesses.
